In December 2021, Blinkit, a quick commerce startup formerly known as Grofers, temporarily stopped operations in areas where it could not service within 10 minutes. The decision comes on the back of the company's rebranding amid increased competition, with well-funded startups like Mumbai-based Zepto, Swiggy's Instamart and Google-backed Dunzo all promising to deliver groceries and other essentials in 10-20 minutes. "In the near term, this call will have a significant impact for our business size and for a large number of our customers," according to the statement by Dhindsa. Co-founder, Grofer's "We expect this to impact around 75,000 of the 200,000 daily customers we are serving. The company is ramping up fast, opening a new store every 4 hours and it is expecting to serve affected customers within 4 weeks."

The ever-growing number of players in the quick commerce space includes ride-hailing giant Ola and e-grocer BigBasket, which is working on its own quick commerce service called BBnow. Zepto's USP is 10-minute delivery. For the model to work, the companies operating in the space will have to find product market fit at a city level and even community level. All quick commerce companies are figuring out unit economics and their path to profitability, and there is no dearth of capital flowing into the sector.

Q.6. Attempt all parts of the following:

(2×15=30)

6(a) Think of a hypothetical company and suggest an appropriate positioning strategy for that company in quick delivery space.

6(b) What core competencies would companies like Blinkit and Zepto etc. would require in terms of distribution management to deal with hyper competition in 10 minutes delivery space.
