On March 2, when Barbara Carroll of Berkeley Lake, Ga., ordered three boxes of Pom toilet paper for two office buildings she manages, using the company's debit card. Each box held 48 rolls. There are multiple sellers on Amazon that stock this particular product, and she chose one called The Ideal Store. The cost for the toilet paper was $88.17. Carroll clicked two-day shipping, then Buy, and she was done. Two days later the toilet paper arrived at the building and all was well. Less than a week later, Carroll was doing a regular check of the bank account when she discovered a deduction dated March 6 for $7,543.17. When she went into her Amazon account, she found that she'd been charged $88.17 for the toilet paper and $7,455 for the delivery.

"As soon as I saw that number I knew I didn't have to worry, because Amazon would see it was a problem and fix it right away," she told USA TODAY. That's not what happened. Carroll called Amazon's customer service multiple times, and each time the person who opened her file laughed and said the delivery fee obviously was crazy.

But then they poked around a little more and would tell her she had to take it up with The Ideal Company, the third-party seller from whom she'd bought the toilet paper.

In Carroll's case, she'd ordered from a third-party seller that doesn't do its fulfilment through Amazon, so the order was shipped by The Ideal Company. She called that seller's phone number when Amazon told her to take it up with the company. No one answered, but she left several messages. USA TODAY called The Ideal Company's New York (347) area code, too, and also left a message. Neither got any response. So she wrote an email to Amazon's CEO, Jeff Bezos, explaining what had happened and asking him to stand by the company's policy of providing customers with high-quality service and being responsive to their concerns. Between her letter to Bezos and her emails to Amazon, she sent in six different complaints. Each time, she got back a form message saying that she could not be refunded because there had been no shipping problem: The toilet paper was shipped on time, it was shipped to the right location, and it wasn't damaged.

With no response from Amazon or The Ideal Company, she called the consumer help team at the local Atlanta television station, WSB-TV. A story aired May 11 and was picked up by media around the country, including USA TODAY.

An Amazon finance staffer called Carroll at home on Wednesday to tell her that the money should appear in the building bank account "within several days," in his words. The money reached the bank account Wednesday, Carroll told USA TODAY. "They even reimbursed us for the three cases of toilet paper!" she said.

Q.6. Attempt all parts of the following:

6(a) Barbara Carroll is what kind of a complainer?

6(b) What are the various recovery strategies Amazon could have followed to prevent this issue getting big?
