Red Bull exemplifies taking risks in marketing. The brand's founder initially lost all of his savings, $1 million, in just the first two years. He also struggled to find bottlers for his energy drink and to secure portions of the market. Later, when the brand started to see success and tried to expand into England, they failed miserably once again.

The brand saw a path forward by taking an enormous risk in its marketing. Rather than focusing on the product itself, Red Bull focuses on experiences they promise to create. Looking at their social media pages won't tell you much about the product you can buy. Instead, the content revolves around people working to achieve dreams and seize opportunities.

Customers can see examples of seizing opportunities everywhere, from the brand sponsoring extreme sporting events to having athletes as brand ambassadors, particularly when introducing a product to a new market. This helps build brand awareness and prepares the target demographic for the new product.

Some key strengths of Red Bull's marketing strategy include:

- They saw failure as an opportunity to regroup and try again.
- The brand's marketing focuses less on the actual product and more on the experiences people want to have—including their slogan: "Red Bull gives you wings."
- The brand is able to focus on what drives their customers and aligns their product with those desires. This goes beyond just helping customers see the product as answering a pain point, but more as seeing a product as a part of an entire experience.

4(a) Throw light on the Red Bull's approach of 'not focusing on the product rather focusing on the experience they promise to create'. Cite examples in support of your opinion from any other product segment.

4(b) Outline a social media plan highlighting how Red Bull can create a larger customer base using User Generated Content (UGC).
