SECTION-C

Q.4. Attempt all parts of the following:

(2×8=16)

A multinational corporation, GlobalTech Inc., has offices and teams in various countries. The company promotes diversity and has a global team responsible for developing new products. The team comprises members from the United States, Japan, Germany, India, and Brazil, each bringing their unique cultural backgrounds and communication styles. The global team is tasked with creating a groundbreaking product and meeting tight deadlines. They communicate primarily through video conferences, emails, and occasional in-person meetings. However, the project encounters several challenges related to intercultural communication differences:

1. Decision-Making Styles: The American team members are accustomed to quick decision-making and value directness. In contrast, the Japanese team members prefer consensus-building and often communicate indirectly, which leads to misunderstandings and delays in decision-making.
2. Communication Norms: The Brazilian team members are warm and expressive, often incorporating humor and personal anecdotes into their conversations. This style is perceived as unprofessional by the German team members, who prefer straightforward, formal communication.
3. Time Management: The Indian team members have a different perception of punctuality and deadlines. They tend to be more flexible with time, while the German team members value punctuality and adherence to schedules.
4. Language Barriers: English is the common language used for communication within the team. However, not all team members are native English speakers, leading to occasional language barriers and misunderstandings.

The project is at risk due to these intercultural communication challenges. The team leader, Sarah, is aware of the importance of diversity but is unsure how to address these issues without creating resentment or conflicts within the team. The team members are becoming frustrated with the communication barriers, and the project's progress is slowing down.

4(a) As an expert advice the team leader, Sarah in the above case for effective measures to be taken in order to curb these intercultural communication challenges and enhance teamwork.

4(b) What role do intercultural differences play in communication and business?
