McCain's business

The McCain product most people recognize is Oven Chips. McCain is the world's largest producer of chips, buying 12 percent of the British potato crop. McCain is also one of the world's largest frozen foods companies. McCain is a privately owned company with a strong market focus. This means that it carries out research to find out what consumers want. It then uses this market information to create products that consumers want to buy. McCain's business is broader than just chips, with a range as wide as frozen potato specialties and frozen light meals. It provides consumers with a wide variety of cut and seasoned potato products through UK retailers, such as supermarkets and restaurants. These include roast potatoes, potato wedges, hash browns, waffles and potato croquettes. McCain produces more specific potato shapes like Potato Smiles, Crispy Bites and Sumthings (shaped as numbers) which appeal to younger consumers. McCain also makes pizzas. Chips have come a long way since the potato was first brought to this country by Walter Raleigh in the seventeenth century. By the 1850s fish and chips were sold in the streets and alleys of London and in some of Britain's industrial towns.

If asked to name a typically English dish, most people will say 'fish and chips'. Chips are produced in lots of different shapes and sizes, ranging from those deep-fried in fish and chip shops to McCain's 5 percent fat oven chips

External challenges

One of the biggest environmental factors affecting McCain in 2005/06 was the growing concern about obesity, particularly in children. This case study shows how McCain has risen to the challenges of this debate and other external challenges. McCain's view is that its chips can and do play a role in a healthy balanced diet and it is continually finding ways to ensure McCain products are as healthy as possible.

Social factors

Social trends are one of the key factors affecting a business. Consumer buying patterns are determined by trends. Just as the demand for some popular clothes are determined by fashion, demand for food products is determined by eating patterns. Eating habits are always changing. Currently one in four of all British potatoes consumed are eaten as chips. Recently McCain and other food producers have seen a slowdown in sales as a result of campaigns to encourage healthier eating such as that spearheaded by Jamie Oliver.

Q.1. How could the sales force contribute to analyzing and responding to a changing market environment?

Q.2. If you have to sell McCain Chips to business customers, who would be your target audience and on what basis would you pitch the product to the target audience?
