SECTION-C

The Doha Development Round, launched in 2001, is one of the most significant multilateral trade negotiations under the WTO. Its main objective was to enhance the trading prospects of developing countries by addressing global trade imbalances. The negotiations focused on reducing tariffs on agricultural and industrial goods, improving market access, and addressing special concerns of developing nations, such as food security and the protection of local industries. However, the Doha Round faced numerous challenges, including disagreements between developed and developing countries over agricultural subsidies, market access, and tariff reductions. Developed countries, such as the United States and the European Union, wanted emerging economies like India, China, and Brazil to open their markets for industrial goods and services. In contrast, developing countries argued for the reduction of agricultural subsidies in developed nations, which they believed distorted global agricultural markets.

One of the biggest points of contention during the Doha Round was agricultural subsidies provided by developed countries. The United States and the European Union heavily subsidized their agricultural sectors, making it difficult for farmers in developing countries to compete. Developing nations, including India and Brazil, argued that these subsidies needed to be drastically reduced or eliminated to create a fair playing field for all countries. While developing nations pushed for the reduction of agricultural subsidies, developed countries sought greater market access for industrial goods and services. The U.S. and the EU wanted emerging economies to lower tariffs on their goods, which developing countries were hesitant to do. They feared that lowering tariffs would expose their domestic industries to international competition, potentially harming local businesses. Developing nations, particularly in Africa and Asia, demanded that special provisions be maintained to protect their interests. They sought more flexibility in implementing WTO agreements, arguing that the needs and capacities of developing economies were vastly different from those of developed nations. The SDT provisions included longer timeframes for implementing agreements, exemptions, and technical assistance to help developing countries adjust to global trade rules.

The Doha Round negotiations have stalled multiple times due to persistent disagreements. Despite numerous attempts at compromise, no consensus has been reached, and the future of the Doha Round remains uncertain. Many have criticized the WTO for failing to adapt to the changing dynamics of global trade, as the rise of regional trade agreements, such as the Trans-Pacific Partnership (TPP) and the Regional Comprehensive Economic Partnership (RCEP), has shifted the focus away from multilateral negotiations. While the WTO continues to play a vital role in resolving trade disputes and promoting free trade, the failure of the Doha Round highlights the challenges the organization faces in balancing the interests of developed and developing nations.

Q.4. Attempt all parts of the following:

(2×10=20)

- 4(a) Explain the primary challenges faced by the WTO during the Doha Development Round negotiations by identifying the same in case study?
- 4(b) Why has the Doha Development Round not achieved its intended objectives, and what impact has this had on global trade negotiations?
