McDonald's, a global fast-food giant, provides a compelling case study on the power of localization in international marketing. The brand has successfully established itself in over 100 countries, not by imposing a one-size-fits-all menu, but by tailoring its offerings to local tastes.

In India, for instance, McDonald's respects the country's cultural and religious practices by not serving beef or pork. Instead, they offer a menu filled with vegetarian options and locally-inspired dishes like the McAloo Tikki. This strategy has allowed McDonald's to thrive in a market where many Western fast-food chains have struggled. In Japan, McDonald's adapts its offerings to meet local food preferences by introducing items such as the Teriyaki Burger and the Ebi Filet-O, a shrimp burger. By customizing its products to fit the tastes and values of these markets, McDonald's demonstrates the importance of understanding cultural preferences and building a product offering that resonates locally. This has helped McDonald's succeed in markets where other international fast-food chains have struggled.

Q.4. Attempt all parts of the following:

(2×10=20)

- 4(a) Imagine you are a marketing manager for a fast-food chain entering a culturally diverse country like India. What strategies would you implement to ensure cultural sensitivity in your offerings?
- 4(b) Analyze McDonald's localization strategy in India and Japan. How did product adaptation align with cultural preferences to drive market success, and what lessons can other global brands learn from this approach?
