The Accra Beach Hotel in Barbados, known for its prime beachfront location and diverse facilities, had gained popularity among both leisure and corporate travelers. However, in recent years, the hotel has experienced a significant shift in its clientele, with an increasing number of corporate guests utilizing its facilities for business meetings and conferences. The hotel's peak season from January to March consistently achieved high occupancy and room rates, ranging between $140 and $150 per night.

The West Indies Cricket Board (WICB) presented the hotel management, led by Cherita Howard and General Manager Jon Martineau, with an intriguing proposal to host the upcoming West Indies Cricket Home Series. This international event, featuring teams from India and New Zealand, promised substantial marketing exposure for the hotel through its inclusion in promotional materials and live broadcasts.

The offer, however, came with challenges. The WICB sought 50 rooms per phase of the series at a heavily discounted rate of $110 per night, along with free laundry services for the teams' uniforms, potentially costing the hotel an additional $20 to $200 daily. While the deal could significantly boost the hotel's visibility and brand recognition, Cherita and Jon grappled with concerns about the financial implications and operational disruptions. Hosting the cricket teams could displace higher-paying corporate guests and create logistical challenges in maintaining service quality for regular patrons.

Faced with this decision, the hotel management needed to weigh the short-term revenue loss against the potential long-term branding benefits and determine how best to balance the needs of existing customers with the opportunity for increased visibility from the high-profile event.

Q.4. Attempt all parts of the following:(2×10=20)

- 4(a) In the context of the Accra Beach Hotel case, how can the Service Marketing Triangle (company, customers, and employees) be applied to manage the experience of both the WICB cricket teams and the hotel's existing corporate guests? Discuss how the balance between internal marketing, external marketing, and interactive marketing could help in this scenario.
- (b) Considering the above case, what strategies would you, as the marketing manager, consider when deciding whether to accept the WICB's offer? How would you balance the marketing potential of the event with the risk of displacing higher-paying business clients?
