Sales Strategies in the Indian FMCG Market

Rupa & Co., a mid-sized FMCG company in India, specializes in personal care and hygiene products. Over the past three years, the company has faced intense competition from both domestic players and multinational giants. While the quality of Rupa's products is widely acknowledged, the brand struggles to maintain market share due to aggressive sales tactics from competitors.

To boost its presence, Rupa recently restructured its sales strategy. It introduced trade schemes for wholesalers, implemented data-driven route planning for sales representatives, and enhanced its visibility in kirana (local retail) stores through in-store promoters and branded displays.

Additionally, Rupa embraced digitization by equipping its field sales team with mobile apps to capture real-time stock levels, monitor competitor activity, and submit orders directly into the company's ERP system. However, despite these efforts, Rupa's rural market penetration remains stagnant, and the ROI on trade promotions seems inconsistent.

Q.4. Attempt all parts of the following:

(2×10=20)

Q.1. Identify the effectiveness of Rupa & Co.'s current sales practices. What changes would you recommend to better penetrate rural markets and improve ROI on trade promotions?

Q.2. In the context of Indian FMCG distribution, how can companies strike a balance between traditional sales channels (like kirana stores and wholesalers) and modern trade (e-commerce, organized retail)?
