ABC Consulting, a mid-tier management consulting firm, prides itself on collaborative problem-solving and cross-functional teams. Team Atlas, composed of six high-performing consultants, was formed to lead a critical project for one of ABC's largest clients: a multinational retailer undergoing digital transformation.

Despite the impressive individual resumes of the team members, their first three weeks were marred by conflict, poor communication, and missed internal deadlines.

The Team Composition:

Lena, the team lead, is known for her strategic thinking but often prefers working alone.

Kate, a data analyst, is quiet but highly accurate in his work.

Melissa, a client-facing consultant, is extroverted and dominates meetings.

Darius, a junior consultant, tries to contribute but is often interrupted.

Sofia, the project manager, emphasizes deadlines and structure.

Omar, a creative thinker, frequently challenges others' ideas, often without offering alternatives.

Early Team Dynamics

Meetings were long, and few decisions were finalized. Sofia tried to impose structure, but Melissa and Omar frequently diverged from the agenda. Lena hesitated to intervene in interpersonal conflicts, believing the team should “self-regulate.” Darius became noticeably quiet after being cut off multiple times. Kate rarely spoke unless asked directly.

Team Atlas missed their first major internal milestone. Senior management expressed concern about team cohesion and client readiness.

Turning Point

Following the missed milestone, Lena scheduled a team “reset” session. Everyone attended, but tension was evident. Some members voiced frustrations; others stayed silent. While ideas were shared, there was no clear resolution or follow-up plan.

The project deadline was now six weeks away, and the team’s success—and their standing in the firm—was on the line.

- 4(a) Apply the concepts of group dynamics to identify the issues that hindered Team Atlas’s performance during the initial weeks of the project.
- 4(b) Construct a suitable conflict management or team development model to propose how Lena could improve collaboration and guide Team Atlas toward meeting the project deadline.
